GRADUATE PROFILE

Eámonn Brockenbrough, class of 2015

Eámonn, whose photographs appeared in a UNESCO exhibit in Paris in 2019, graduated with a major in Art Education and has since been very busy making his mark in the world. "Since graduating, I worked as an art teacher for three years and spent the summers traveling. My first summer I went to India to retrace the route of a study abroad trip I had done while at Longwood. I was trying to see some more of the country and find some of the people I had photographed a few years before."

The Cormier Honors College influenced Eámonn in two major ways, both during and after his time at Longwood. "Two contributions of the Honors College I would say are really fundamental to who I am as a person. First, the opportunities they gave me to travel and see so far beyond my little small-town upbringing. That was invaluable and has driven me to seek out and understand the experiences of others. Second, the emphasis placed on stewardship and service has always stuck with me. If you find yourself privileged enough to be in a position to contribute something, no matter how seemingly small, to a cause that's dear to you, it's your obligation to do so."

Carson Cook, class of 2016

Carson's degree in Photography with a minor in Art History led first to a spot as a freelance reporter for the Farmville Herald immediately after graduation. After serving as the Community Engagement Coordinator for the Longwood Center for the Visual Arts, the campus art museum, she landed in her current position as Senior Web Producer for the Colonial Williamsburg Foundation, where she manages web projects, analyzes data, and collaborates with colleagues on brand alignment and customer service.

At Longwood, Carson served as the photo editor for the campus newspaper, The Rotunda, and participated in the Student Government Association as an elected senator. A member of the Cormier Honors College, she was also involved in the Kappa Pi International Art Honor Society and Design Lab, Longwood's student-run design agency, which offers students professional design experience and undergraduate research opportunities. Serving as an in-house internship, Design Lab gives selected students the opportunity to create and produce diverse, professional projects spanning print pieces to web and interactive products.
